Capital accumulation is an important factor for economic growth. Financial development affects economic growth by increasing capital accumulation. In this study, the effects of financial development on economic growth in Turkey for the 1960-2013 period are examined. Private sector lending and GDP data are analysed using Granger causality test. According to our findings, there is bidirectional causality between financial development and economic growth.