Abstract

Recurrent traumatic injury to immature permanent teeth and environmental tissue may result in extraction of teeth. Due to the growing process of young patients is not completed, until the completion of this process and the fixed prosthesis is fabricated, space maintenance should be prepared for aesthetic and function. This case report presents the use of the clinical crown of failed teeth as the part of partial space maintenance and its beneficial effect on the patient who had multiply dental trauma many times from seven years of age.