The frontiers of local politics are quite difficult to be separated in terms of its research area, scope and relationship with the different research areas. It can be observed that, within different parts of the world, studies of local politics focus on women, civil society and development, etc. besides local actors and elections. Studies of local politics in Turkey are generally considered as part of the national politics and acknowledged as an activity that is shaped by local administrative institutions. In this article, chief studies on this subject matter are classified and the perception and comprehension of local politics within academia are discussed. At the same time, how the studies are conducted in a certain period of time in Isparta, which is evaluated as a region where the studies of local politics are centred on, is analyzed along with the table showing the local politics in Isparta. Considering these evaluations, it is discussed that the local politics concepts and researches are to be re-evaluated, redesigned, and updated.
