Is it a doctrine and a way of life? Or a religion? It is thought that alchemy, which is still being discussed today, is not just about laboratory studies, but it is also nurtured by the cultural and religious motives of its society at the same time. Gold, which has endurance against Fire and Water, has become a substance that has been identified with divine power through impermeability and solidity in all the communities that lived through history. It was believed to bring sacredness and immortality to those who have shiny metals like gold. The efforts of the alchemists to convert them into gold are in fact to ensure their spiritual transformation. They believed that by providing their own spiritual transformations they would be saved from all worldly diseases and even immortalized. The rituals, magic, ab-i hayat (elixir of life) potions are intended to purify from evil and to attain immortality. Alchemy, whose historical beginning still continues to be debated and which continues to exist today, has been regarded as a preliminary chemistry, but it has been regarded by some as an art and science, and it has also begun to attract the curiosity of many administrators and scholars. Alchemy, which is often known as the way to obtain gold and regarded only as lab operations, has always defended the harmonious coexistence of the external with the internal, the soul with the body and the individual with the nature.
