ABSTRAC

This work is related to social structure and the institutional processes in the Central Asian Turkish Republics. They suffered to controlled social and cultural changes by dominant Sovietic actors during the USSR rule. After 1990’s, when they transformed to independent states, their social processes both leaded the characteristics of former social system and appeared some disfunctionalities in their institutional processes. Problems of institutional process has determinated to appear local and informal new institutionalities and social patterns. These conditions have caused to both social disintegrations and have delayed to gain the nation-state identities of societies which have been formed the Central Asian Turkish Republics.
